New York, New York

Kate Swearengen represents national, regional, and local labor unions in a broad range of industries, including postal delivery, healthcare, federal court security, maritime transport, laundry and food service distribution, and piano manufacturing. She represents unions in federal and state court litigation; in administrative proceedings, including before the National Labor Relations Board and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission; and in arbitrations involving employee discipline and contract interpretation. Kate also represents individual employees with respect to various employment matters. She is a chapter editor of How to Take a Case Before the National Labor Relations Board and The Developing Labor Law, both published by the American Bar Association's Section of Labor and Employment Law, and she is a member of the Section's Committee on Development of the Law Under the National Labor Relations Act. She is a member of the AFL-CIO Union Lawyers Alliance (formerly the Lawyers Coordinating Committee) and the National Employment Lawyers Association. Kate graduated from Princeton University (with honors) and from Columbia Law School.
